a little bit always the same if you had the previous ones

This is the third installment of the increasingiy intriguing story of Hal and Jem Bishop. They're cursebreakers in a world much like Victorian London, but with an industrial revolution based on magic, not steam. In this book, Hal and Jem are called out by the son of a colleague of their late father, the architect of the new magic technology. But while trying to discover why the son is being pursued by a death phantom, Hal and Jem discover that something even more disturbing is going on, and it may have to do with the death of their father.This series has wonderful world-building - the grimy feel of the mid-19th century English industrial landscape is mixed with an almost Lovecraftian unseen world of the supernatural, giving the series a Gothic feeling that sends shivers up your spine. Hal and Jem are great characters, and I hope to read more of them soon
